Some of these products will cause problems with DSL, but it is really an individual case-by-case basis. You should check with the Manufacturer directly (Most will tell you it works on most DSL connections), since the HomePNA spec is designed to coexist on a line with DSL.

You should also check in the software of the HomePNA adapter, since many have a power setting for High and Low power. This may also help eliminate Noise and make the Home Network operate at higher speeds. These products are more apt to be interfered with, vs causing the interference.
